

Melanie Stevens
Assistant Editor

Destined to Separate

Sometimes the biggest part of someone is their reality and sometimes the other part is their fantasy. What comes in between?

It's difficult to determine the in between boundaries for detection on who we are. The fantasy we think about in which we want to make our real life. We process all these desires and dreams.

We think about what we would like to have and what we know we need to accomplish to get there, but then we don't always act upon them. So, the next day we are at the same place doing the exact same thing we tell ourselves we don't want to do.

We live each day with an existing objective to be successful not only in our careers, but in our personal lives. What we think about and put together silently to ourselves repeatedly is what lies between our way to destine who we are and who we want to become.

We destine who we want to become through realization. I have detected as I started off my twenties I have begun to learn so much more about myself. I am realizing what life is about accompanied by the truth that death is real, that friends do go, that people are the way they are and the consequences behind diverse situations. I feel as if I am finding out who I am and by the time I reach 30 I have revealed the type of woman I am.

We destine who we want to become through observation. This defines watching the people around us and how they live and what they go through. We observe our surroundings and discover what comforts us and what makes us uncomfortable to relate to our likes and dislikes in a fraction of our lives.

We destine who we want to become through illumination. We learn to X out who and what is negative in our lives, what depresses us and what brings us down. This follows with difficult strength to let go of certain people in our lives that bring us down, but at the same time bring us fun times. This follows the consistent abuse outings to the bars that do no good for us, except make a deeper hole in our pockets and take us away from our responsibilities we give up for this. This follows bad habits anything from bad organization, procrastination and harmful uses we do to ourselves to take us way from our dreams.

We destine who we want to become through will power. This contains strength to keep going to motivate us constantly and find the power to determine ourselves away from the past and into the future that holds our purpose at hand.

We destine who we want to become through self-discipline. This means to punish ourselves when we take too long of a break and to keep ourselves from the temptation of amusement when we have priorities and responsibilities first like work, school or prior engagements that we may not always want to do. We hold ourselves back from what we know deep inside is not what's going to help us in the long run, so we discipline and choose what we don't want instead because in the end it will be what we needed to choose.

We destine who we become through hard work. This is working every day to make a new change within ourselves starting with one thing at a time, Whether it be learning to be more organized, neater, or less tense, we try to improve what can and learn to accept what we know will never change. We should never take it all on at once because it's too overwhelming and change in ourselves takes precious time and obvious patience.

Closing the walls to our two sides of existence is learning to separate our reality from our fantasy.