

Melanie Stevens
Assistant Editor

Interpreting the Selfish

Selfishness stems from lack of self-growth and scarcity of willingness to think and appreciate others without wanting something for themselves.

Selfish people think of themselves first most of the time.

Selfish people only consider what's best for them, even though it's bad for someone else.

Selfish people don't realize they are being selfish.

Selfish people usually expect something in return when they have given.

Selfish people usually lack personal goals and direction for their dreams.

Selfish people will often throw things in your face.

Selfish people usually feel sorry for themselves.

Selfish people are not concerned for the emotions of others.

Selfish people do to you what they don't want done to them.

Selfish people are hypocritical, not logical.

Selfish people contradict themselves.

Selfish people can't really understand where you are coming from.

Selfish people will not likely be in your life in the end; as for they were never there in the beginning.

Selfish people do not resemble true friends, not even to themselves.

Selfish people often use bad experiences in their life as an excuse for who they are now.

Selfish people will talk over you, not with you.

Selfish people will only see things their way, even if their way is the wrong way.

Selfish people become irrational when they don't get what they want.

Selfish people don't know how to compromise.

Selfish people love to take what's not theirs and what they don't have.

Selfish people expect more, when you give a little.

Selfish people always want to be first because generosity doesn't exist to them.

Selfish people are absent to themselves, but present to their wants.

Selfish people will argue a lot just to help believe what they are saying.

Selfish people cheat on what they never will win.

Selfish people lie to feel better about who they are.

Selfish people are not really happy for you when something good happens to you. They wish it happened to them.

Selfish people don't deserve what they don't earn.

Selfish people only accept what benefits them.

Selfish people define good as not enough.

Selfish people only weigh you down, not lift you up.

Selfish people usually will not finish what they started.

Selfish people will assume what they don't know, not what they fear to learn.

Selfish people only want from you what's good for them.

Selfish people lack something in their life.

Selfish people rely on others to make them feel good about themselves.

Selfish people suffer from low self-esteem.

Selfish people are threatened by others, including themselves.

Accepting someone in your life who is selfish, is keeping in mind that they most likely will always be that way. When their selfishness arises, try and remember that it's in their nature to be that way. It's not you whom they are striking at, but at the emptiness they allow themselves to deny.